NOTES ON THE HURRICANE

The hurricane of September 13 spared no section of the Island, and left in its wake a wide path of destruction with almost complete devastation in large areas of the central and southeastern portions.

The exact number of killed and wounded will probably never be known, but according to official records only 260 persons lost their lives. In view of the widespread destruction of buildings the fatalities seem incredibly small. Among the reasons given for the relatively low figure are (1) that the hurricane passed in the day time, (2) that it developed gradually reaching a maximum only after some twelve hours, and (3) that from previous experience the people had learned the safest places of refuge.

The medical problems left by the hurricane are many and complex. General hospitals, of which a larger service is being demanded, nearly everywhere suffered through damage to buildings and equipment. Many health services have been temporarily disorganized. With increased needs and reduced incomes, budgets for the medical work of both Municipalities and Insular Government will have to be revised. Physicians whose successful private practice depends on a prosperous clientele are left with little or no income.

But in one particular the medical situation two weeks after the storm looks more hopeful than it appeared to many physicians immediately following the catastrophe. No serious epidemics have developed and it is now considered possible that if general relief can be hastened with effective measures against hunger in the country districts and dangerous overcrowding in the towns, the Island may pass through the crisis without any marked increase in mortality or morbidity. The increasing demand for laborers for repairs, rebuilding, and cultivation of crops indicates that the normally high percentage of unemployment may be reduced, for a time at least, thus relieving greatly the serious economic condition of the masses and indirectly reducing the health problem.

Another favorable circumstance is the preparedness of the Department of Health, which, with the cooperation of the American Red Cross, has taken extraordinary measures to meet any emergency that may arise.
